Has the 30,000 year old cave art of Chauvet been decoded?

If it has, then it makes the Da Vinci code look like an old trick used again. Deep in a cave in the Ardeche region of France there is a set of paintings that have left the world stunned and amazed by the skill and quality of the work. Little did anyone suspect of what else lay hidden in the images themselves.

In one section of the art we see a lion spread across the wall with its mouth slightly open, but this is no ordinary lion. It's a map of North Africa and Spain with a glimpse of the coast line of France in the bay of Biscay. The lion also appears to contain the Nile. Not as we know it today, but showing the original rivers. Sat right next to the Pyramids is a dried up river bed. This is the exact river bed being shown in the map.

The cave was discovered in 1994 and the art inside had been studied very carefully. Then, in 2012 a further chance discovery was made.

Hidden in the art is some form of message or coded story.

This book takes you on a journey through the minds and eyes of our ice age relatives and makes us ask ourselves a whole new range of questions about our origins and our past.

Does this 30,000 year old art show us the true origins of the ancient Egyptian culture? Is there more to be found in what some call 'primitive' art? Why do so many images in the cave turn up in Egypt and other locations around the world?

only worse. If you are interested in the subject of ...

By G. Lovett

I want to first qualify myself, not as an expert, but as an avid amateur who has read 40+ books on the subject of Paleolithic art and archeology, as well as traveled to south western France specifically to visit caves with parietal art--Pech Merle and Font-de-Gaume, among others. That said, the hypotheses contained here are, frankly, silly. It is as if I noticed that the sun and a soccer ball are both round and therefore concluded they must be somehow directly related to one another, only worse. If you are interested in the subject of Paleolithic art, I would suggest Paul Bahn's book, Journey Through the Ice Age, as a good place to start. You might also watch Herzog's film, Cave of Forgotten Dreams, as a primer on Chauvet cave.

Through the Paleolithic looking glass

By Bethe

If you are interested in ancient maps, a single picture in this book makes it worth a look. Imagine the thirteenth century renderings (such as the DiCanestrus map) which portray continents as human bodies. Move back in time 35,000 years and imagine Europe and North Africa mapped as animal bodies.

And as star maps on the ceilings of caves.

Imagine walking along the bank of a totally placid and glass-like river on a sunny day, enjoying the fantastic "beings" that appear as the shore is perfectly mirrored in the water. I have often seen such faces as the one on the cover of this book. (Just orient the image to horizontal.)

I don't want to judge this book because I don't know enough about Egypt, calendars, or ancient religion. I don't accept the pyramid on Mars theory. And I don't really like Amazon's rating categories. But the author has given me a glimpse of a capacity of perception that I want to reawaken.

Compelling information and food for thought.

By M.R.C.

I think the cave paintings are just tremendous, so was interested in what the author had to share in terms of underlying or hidden drawings beneath the incredible art, linking ancient civilizations. I found the book very compelling and feel it tracks back to what Picasso said when seeing leaving Lascaux "We have learned nothing." Have we learned and lost vast information before? How can such similarities of elements within paintings happen when there's over 20,000 years between them? And what about that map within the drawings of the cats? Wow! Many questions raised and great food for thought! I'll look forward to further interpretations from the author and others.
